Whole, Not Half

There's a dangerous lie that's crept into Christian culture, the idea that you're only complete when you find "your other half." But the truth of God's Word is clear: you are not half a person waiting to be completed. You are whole in Christ.

Colossians 2:10 declares, "And you are complete in Him, who is the head of all principality and power."

Marriage is beautiful, yes. But it is not a reward for wholeness, nor a fix for brokenness. It is not your identity. Christ is. And He never asked you to wait to live fully until someone walks into your life. He's calling you to live fully now.

You do not have to apologise to any one. You have every reason to raise up your head daily, not in shame but in deep rooted contentment knowing that God's mercy, grace and consistent love are all that you need to move from day to day. You do not need anyone's approval or pity.

Wholeness in Christ doesn't mean you don't long for companionship. It means your identity, peace, and joy don't hinge on it. You are not missing something, you are discovering someone. And that someone is you, the version of you that walks confidently in your calling, embraces purpose in every season, and loves deeply from a place of fullness, not lack.

Let your singleness be a testimony of sufficiency. Let your joy shine in a world that assumes you're waiting to be rescued. Let your life declare this truth: "Jesus didn't leave me lacking, He filled me to overflow."

You are not incomplete. You are not in limbo. You are a whole vessel carrying eternal treasures, and God is waiting for you to step out daily and pour forth the virtues that are within you.

You must remember, your life is not on hold, your life is a moving testimony of God's purity, grace and love.
