Reflecting Christ in the Boardroom

You don't need a pulpit to preach Christ, your life speaks louder than your lips ever could. In your workplace, people are watching, listening, learning from how you carry yourself. They notice your tone in tense conversations, your integrity in private decisions, your joy under pressure. Every choice you make as a boss either reflects Christ or blurs the view. 2 Corinthians 3:2 says, "You yourselves are our letter, written on our hearts, known and read by everyone." You are a walking message of God's grace, power, and goodness.

You may be the only expression of Jesus your staff will ever meet. When you lead with kindness instead of pride, they feel it. When you apologize sincerely, when you praise genuinely, when you forgive quickly, they see Christ. Don't underestimate the holy power of gentleness, or the witness in your work ethic. The fruit of the Spirit isn't just for Sundays, it's for conference calls and coffee breaks too. Its for those times when you feel like gossiping or boasting about your self-importance and you fail to listen to God speaking. It's for those times, when ambition has kept you too fixated on thinking that everyone below you is not good enough and you're drowning in your imagined high intelligence, only for you to frustrate everyone below you and make them feel so inferior but yet they smile only because they need to survive.

Your boardroom can be a place of breakthrough, not just business. Invite the Holy Spirit to sit at the table with you, to give you insight, timing, and wisdom. Lead by listening, first to Him, then to others. Be slow to speak, quick to understand, eager to build others up. When Christ is reflected through you, even secular spaces become sacred.

Let your leadership be the mirror that helps others catch a glimpse of the Savior. Because you're not just building a brand, you're building a testimony.
